Paragraphs: Thanks for subscribing!; In 2016, in the run up to the presidential election, we were watching the rise of discord, vitriol and nastiness in our public spaces. We started thinking about how we might practice our craft differently - how we might go to the heart of divides, to places of conflict, as journalists always have, but once there, do something different.; We knew we wanted to take the core tools of our craft - careful vetting of information, diligent research, attentive listening, curiosity, a commitment to serving the public good and our democracy - and do something new.; We mapped out a process, now called dialogue journalism, for going to the heart of social and political fractures and building journalism-supported conversations between regular people about the issues of deep consequence to all us.; Since its founding, one of the first journalism organizations in the bridging space, Spaceship Media has hosted dialogues in partnership with media organizations across the country about some of most divisive issues in our nation: guns, immigration, policing, electoral politics, race, education.; We continue to iterate our practices, partnering with organizations, in and outside the journalism space, to create novel challenges to the rising challenges of authoritarianism and the ongoing dysfunction in our news and information spaces.; ; Some of our work; Seven steps of dialogue journalism; Now Live!; Can Dialogue Journalism Engage Audiences, Foster Civil Discourse, and Increase Trust in the Media?; A Facebook group where liberal and conservative women actually listen to each other; A Facebook experiment suggests beliefs, not facts, are what really divide us; 510.846.3380; spaceshipmedia@spaceshipmedia.org; (C)2024 Spaceship Media. Paragraphs: Spaceship Media launched in 2016 with a mission to reduce polarization, build communities, and restore trust in journalism.; Careful listening and empathy are vital to supporting meaningful civic dialogue and easing polarization and we believe journalism is essential in that process - which ultimately strengthens our democracy. To do that right, the best journalistic values - fairness, thorough research, accuracy - must be held to now more than ever.; We go right to the heart of problematic situations by bringing people from communities in conflict - or that simply aren't communicating - together into a journalism-supported dialogue. We amplify that process by working with our news partners to tell the stories that arise organically from those conversations.; We work with media organizations and others on several different levels. We design and manage engagement conversations from the ground up; we provide design and ongoing consulting support; we provide consulting around our engagement values and methodology and project visioning.; We work with news organizations to identify communities that aren't talking or are in conflict and design a Conversation Experience through which they can engage constructively.; We explore with each of these communities what they think of one another and what they would like to know about the other.; We bring the communities together in an environment designed to welcome people as individuals not simply as avatars of a particular political, social or cultural position; We support an experience that revolves around the participants as much as if not more than our aims or those of the sponsoring organizations; it is a rare opportunity to engage deeply with others with whom they disagree.; We moderate our conversations closely, helping people engage respectfully with one another and using tested techniques to help create a productive experience.; As conversations grow, we support them with reporting and research that provides information to the participants, with the aim of establishing an agreed-upon foundation of facts for their discussions.; With newsroom partners, we uncover stories generated in the conversation, including ongoing questions and issues relevant to the community - this amplifies the conversation's impact and provides additional opportunities for engagement.; 510.846.3380; spaceshipmedia@spaceshipmedia.org; (C)2024 Spaceship Media.
