Twitter description: Inspire listening by playing and making art. We can discern instead of judge, evaluate instead of fight, experiment instead of needing to be right.

Description of the organization from a third party source: "From the organizer, Andrew Purchin: "I want to see the beauty in admitting I'm wrong. I want to help others do this, so we can have better conversations. In 2020, I want to take the Curious Scroll across the country with a film crew. I will stop in places where the tension is greatest and offer two dynamic activities: First, I will encourage people on the street to paint on the Curious Scroll, only this time I will ask: Can you show me with the paint how you would feel if the other side wins and gets their way? Show me your angry, sad, scared, despair. What would you lose? Now, can you imagine how the other side would feel and how their painting would look should they lose? Then in separate venues, I will invite opposing sides to meet and try to convince each other of their point of view while they tie the scroll into a knot. How tight do you think the knot would get when let's say, gun rights activists and gun control activists try to convince the other why they are right as they tie the scroll into a knot? Then I will ask both sides to work together to untie that knot in silence.""

Paragraphs: Andrew Purchin / Projects; The first marks on this Curious Scroll occurred at the 2016 Republican and Democratic political conventions, when hundreds of people found their calm painting on this 170-foot-long spool of linen.; Then people in Santa Cruz County added a second layer of marks and paint during the November 2018 election season. We explored questions like; I am grateful to all the people who taught me more about how to be in my loving presence while having conversations with those I disagree with. I'm still a beginner.; What's Next.; In 2020, I had planned to bring the Curious Scroll to places where the tension is greatest. I was excited and terrified to invite opposing sides to meet and try to convince each other of their point of view while they tie the scroll into a knot. How tight do you think the knot would get when let's say, gun rights activists and gun control activists try to convince the other why they are right as they tie the scroll into a knot? Then I would have asked both sides to work together to untie that knot in silence.; ; But after one knot tying and untying experiment on the subject of housing, Covid 19 ended plans for The Curious Scroll in 2020 as it would be dangerous to share this in person.; ; Instead I have developed a guided art-making meditation that you can do from the comfort of your home. No art skills needed!; ; Art-making Meditation; Tonglen to find calm and compassion for self and other (16 minutes); See how KSBW News covered The Curious Scroll here.;

Summaries of Links: Based solely on the information provided, it can be inferred that this organization is likely an art-related entity, potentially an artist's portfolio or an art gallery. The presence of terms like "portfolio," "sketchbook," "projects," "statement," and "blog" suggest a creative or artistic focus. The inclusion of image and video links, as well as an article about an artist combating the political climate with art, further supports this notion. The organization appears to have a website and uses various platforms such as Vimeo and YouTube to showcase its work. Without additional context or information, it is difficult to determine the specific nature or purpose of this organization."""
