Money was sent to the family via general delivery, through the funeral home, through TV stations, through the law firm where she had worked, and directly to her mother, Susan Bro. She approached Alfred Wilson, who had been Heather's supervisor and friend to ask if he would help her establish something legal with accountability.; ; Susan had been a teacher for many years, and Alfred had worked with scholarship funds. It seemed logical to form a scholarship fund. Susan also donated a portion of her personal funds. The original plan was to only give scholarships to Heather's former high school and to Charlottesville High School.; â€œ; IRS paperwork was filed only nine days after Heather's murder. Shortly afterward, Susan was invited to speak at the MTV Video Music Awards. On that stage in front of the world, she announced the formation of the Heather Heyer Foundation. group who took their youth to the Smithsonian Museum of African American History and Culture.
