

""Twitter handle (and profile name): AmericanProj (The Meese Inst for Liberty & the American Project)

Twitter description: "The American Project" has become the Meese Inst for Liberty & the American Project at @PepperdineSPP.

Description of the organization from a third party source: "The American Project is a two-year effort housed at the Pepperdine School of Public Policy (with office space in Malibu, CA and Washington, DC) convening the conversation on American conservatism. At this polarized time in American politics, what is the future of America's conservative movement? Developed through deliberation with dozens of conservative leaders, scholars and activists, the attached "A Way Forward" document points to a "Conservatism of Connection", supporting American institutions which have traditionally provided a common sense of belonging and identity. "

Scraped text from their home page of their website: Titles: Home - The American Project

Headings: The American Project;; Toward a Reimagined Communitarian Conservatism; Original Content; Today's Communitarianism; On Campus | Viewpoint Diversity

Paragraphs: (A robust communitarian conservatism is essential for responding to this era known for its loneliness and alienation.); Original Content; Today's Communitarianism; On Campus | Viewpoint Diversity; Real Clear Policy â— By Ted McAllister; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON FACEBOOK; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON TWITTER; Issues in Science and Technology â— By M. Anthony Mills; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON FACEBOOK; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON TWITTER; Real Clear Policy â— By Hans Zeiger; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON FACEBOOK; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON TWITTER; The New York Times â— By Robert D. McFadden; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON FACEBOOK; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON TWITTER; National Review â— By Joe Pitts; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON FACEBOOK; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON TWITTER; American Enterprise Institute â— By Robert Pondiscio; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON FACEBOOK; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON TWITTER; American Greatness â— By Daniel Oliver; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON FACEBOOK; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON TWITTER; Law & Liberty â— By Tony Spanakos; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON FACEBOOK; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON TWITTER; City Journal â— By Christopher Nadon; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON FACEBOOK; SHARE THIS ARTICLE ON TWITTER

Scraped text from their about page of their website: Titles: About - The American Project

Headings: The American Project;; Toward a Reimagined Communitarian Conservatism; About The American Project; Challenge;; Response;; Attn: American Project; Pepperdine

UniversitySchool Of Public Policy; Email Us;; Attn: American Project; Pepperdine
UniversitySchool Of Public Policy; Email Us:

Paragraphs: (A robust communitarian conservatism is essential for responding to this era known for its loneliness and alienation.); In a provocative essay for the New Criterion titled, "American Conservatism and the Problem of Populism," conservative historian George Nash sees this moment in American politics as being profoundly different from anything he's witnessed in the last half century. Noting early in his piece that "Perhaps the most important fact to assimilate about modern American conservatism is that it is not, and has never been, monolithic. It is a coalition - a coalition built on ideas - with many points of origin and diverse tendencies that are not always easy to reconcile," Nash goes on to outline the different philosophical factions, which combined over decades to create an enduring political movement.; Importantly, in describing the interplay between conservative intellectuals and politicians, Nash makes an essential point: before there were coalitions, there were "ideas." Whether it was the Neo-Cons or the libertarian economists, or the moral traditionalists, each one of these groups had their own intellectual defenders, grassroots political supporters, and media outlets.; Until now.; Towards the end of his essay, Nash concludes, "In short, Trumpist populism is defiantly challenging the fundamental tenets and perspectives of every component of the post-1945 conservative coalition described in this essay." From this dire conclusion, Nash asks, "But conservatives, more than ever, need minds as well as voices, arguments as well as sound bites, and civility as well as indignation. In this season of discontent, it might be useful for conservatives of all persuasions to step back from the fray for a moment and ask themselves a simple question: What do conservatives want? What should they want? Perhaps by getting back, very deliberately to basics, conservative intellectuals can begin to restore some clarity and direction to the debate."; The transformation of American politics will start with new ideas leading to new coalitions solving tomorrow's challenges. Part of America's political re-balancing will start with the renewal of conservatism. What we are proposing here, then, is creating that space for the nation's leading conservative intellectuals (scholars and pundits) to "step back from the fray for a moment" to consider in smaller group deliberations the future of American conservatism and its political expression through the lenses of major policy issues, which have been both sent reeling and disconnected from political expression by the Donald Trump candidacy and this populist era.; This is more than an intellectual exercise, but a high stakes initiative - responding to the possible loss of meaningfully engaging on the defining ideals and values of the American Project. Any hopes for finding a national political balance in the wake of this year's presidential election, must be founded on a renewal of the conservative intellectual tradition capable of addressing both the issues of the moment and speaking to the timeless ideals of The American Project.; To be based at the Pepperdine School of Public Policy (with office and meeting space in Malibu, CA, and Washington, DC), we are proud to announce the launch of the "The American Project on the Future of Conservatism" - a two-year effort, which could be grown into an "Institute" with ongoing presence and influence. Year one will be comprised of two phases followed by a single event in year two.; The focus of this initiative will be on content creation - presenting a set of essays responding to an initial set of questions before the conservative movement;; Essays will be sponsored through the Project, and while composed individually, they will be discussed within respective working groups of 4-5 participants at a weekend colloquium here in Malibu planned for May/June. The goal will be to have these essays published either in groups or individually in leading outlets.; Participants will be invited to the Project based on their past work on these questions with a desire to inviting varying perspectives within the conservative movement. Given our priority on promoting the Project's content, we seek not only scholars, but editors, activists and media to engage in the work of the Project.; The American Project Is Supported By:; The Sarah Scaife Foundation

Scraped text from their mission page of their website: Titles: NA

Headings: NA

Paragraphs: NA

Scraped text from their history page of their website: Titles: NA

Headings: NA

Paragraphs: NA

Summaries of Links: Based on the information provided, it can be inferred that the American Project is an organization that focuses on promoting original content, communitarianism, and viewpoint diversity. The organization also appears to have an advisory council and is affiliated with Pepperdine University's School of Public Policy. Additionally, the American Project seems to have a presence on various social media platforms such as Twitter and Facebook, and it shares articles and videos related to topics such as civic education, the pursuit of happiness, and the union of arts and politics. The organization also appears to have connections with publications like Real Clear Policy, National Review, and City Journal. Overall, the American Project seems to be dedicated to fostering discussions and promoting a diverse range of perspectives on societal and educational issues."""